

Love means never having to say you're sorry.

If you have ever been in a heated discussion with a person you love, you may have felt anger and sadness at the same time. In this essay I will explain the meaning of being in love with a person and why it is easier sometimes to put your ego aside, than confronting a person. I will also interpret this thesis and show why both parties have to be understanding and accepting in a relationship. And finally I will show my point of view.

For some the meaning of being in love with a person is that you want to share your emotions and feelings with the other person. True love is unconditional. And that is why it is always easier to ignore the fact, that something bothers in a relationship, than confronting the other person. Interpreting the quote, you accept the fact that the other person isn't flawless, when you genuinely love them. And you understand that the other person is inevitably going to hurt you. Because in the end we are all imperfect people. A good example is a friend of mine, who often feels unappreciated by her boyfriend, because he chooses his friends over her sometimes. In the end she understands, that he isn't always the guy she wishes him to be, but her love is bigger and so she does not even confront him.

If the relationship is meant to be, you always allow the other person to make mistakes and you don't want them to be sorry for not being perfect.

If a relationship wants to survive, both parties have to trust each other and there needs to be a mutual benefit. If somebody feels less appreciated, because they might feel that they are giving more in the relationship than the other one, then there isn't a mutual benefit anymore. Due to this apologizing and forgiving are necessary in a relationship. The love might be unconditional and transparent, but if one person isn't trying his best, the other person needs a heartfelt and contrite apology, otherwise they lower their self-esteem.

In my opinion both persons in a relationship have to feel, that the other person is wanting. You also have to accept their flaws and the fact that they inevitably will hurt you at a point, but you shouldn't fully just try to neglect the issue. If your partner has made a mistake and you decide to not put your ego aside, your partner has to be understanding too and apologize for a mistake, which maybe they genuinely wouldn't usually apologize to. I think it's important to have a balanced and transparent relationship, in which there is mutual benefit.

As a quintessence from this essay everybody has to have his own opinion to the quote from the "Love Story" from Erich Seagal. The phenomenon of love can't be described, because everybody has another point of view for this topic. You have to accept, that the other person may not be the person you wish they'd be, but it is in your hands to decide whether you love her with her flaws or not.
