

No sunlight, no happiness, only darkness and sadness exists. ^{A lot of} ~~many~~ people went through this situation, ~~opening their eyes~~ ^{because} the lover dumped them, the mother died or the best friend quit their friendship. But is it just a period in life or does this feeling stay forever? In other words, does life really go on or is it just unfair?

I also belong to these people. I made a big mistake. I trusted someone who I really didn't know well. He used me and I was too blind ~~and~~ ^{or} stupid to notice, although all my friends told me, but my love for him was stronger than anything, ~~therefore~~ I didn't see my friends anymore, because they didn't understand ^{me} and respected him. After seeing him making out with a girl, who ^{was} ~~were~~ apparently his other girlfriend, I finally realised that he played with me and wasn't the one who respected me. There I was, alone, no boyfriend, no friends. I didn't know any way out ^{of this}. I was ashamed of myself and didn't want to talk ~~with~~ ^{to} anybody. I saw no light at the end of the tunnel. The whole time I was mad at everything, but my sister was trying to cheer me up. Time passed I started to have contact with my friends ^{again}. I got over him. Now I definitely know that life goes on. It means that life is a roller coaster, I never know exactly in which section of this big dipper I am at the moment. The future is uncertain and full of surprises. It goes up and down.

This experience broaden my mind. I have to be more optimistic. When bad times arrive, I have just let pass time, because the wounds need time to cure. Next time I have to confront my problem with positive thinking, ~~the problem~~ I shouldn't let the problem destroy me, I have to stay strong and realistic. Changes are arriving all the time, I just have to be ready for it.

Mr Robert Frost was absolutely right with his insight that life goes on. After the rain the sun is shining again. Sometimes I have ~~had~~ ^{to} learn to dance in ~~the rain~~ ^{the rain}.
